What makes ex post facto arguably work for the OP's purposes is that you are allowing the relevant fact that is referred to by ex post facto to be the beginning of the project, which is independent of your ...

What's involved here is a tension between transitive and intransitive uses of the past participle spoken. Ordinarily a past participle employed as an adjective has a passive sense: the noun modified is the object of the verb, subject of the passive construction: John did not speak Mary's name, but everyone knew who he was talking about. Mary's name was not spoken. Mary's name was unspoken
