python - What is a Verbose Output? - Stack Overflow

2 I am currently using the GridSearchCV object in python. The function call gives an me option to specify the verbosity. Does anyone know what verbose means in this context? I have not found the documentation to be helpful in this respect. Help on clarifying what this is and what it is used for would be helpful.

What is the use of verbose in Keras while validating the model?

Verbose parameter has no impact on regularisation mechanisms. I'm just adding information about what is displayed if verbose is enabled (to reply to the initial question "What is the use of verbose while training the model?" => ex: avoiding overfitting by comparing acc and val_acc).

How to implement the --verbose or -v option into a script?

if verbose: print ... through my source code, so that if a user passes the -v option, the variable verbose will be set to True and the text will be printed. Is this the right approach or is there a more common way? Addition: I am not asking for a way to implement the parsing of arguments. That I know how it is done. I am only interested specially in the verbose option.

Elegant way for verbose mode in scripts? - Stack Overflow

Almost all answers are about how to create a log function, so I will cover only the second part: how to pass the '-v' option to a command only when verbose mode is on.

python - 'verbose' argument in scikit-learn - Stack Overflow

47 Many scikit-learn functions have a verbose argument that, according to their documentation, "[c]ontrols the verbosity: the higher, the more messages" (e.g., GridSearchCV). Unfortunately, no guidance is provided on which integers are allowed (e.g., can a user set verbosity to 100?) and what level of verbosity corresponds to which integers.
